

This image shows a vertical strip of aged, stained, and torn paper, likely an endpaper or flyleaf from an old book. The paper is a light tan or beige color, heavily marked with numerous brown spots and stains, characteristic of foxing or water damage over time. The right edge of the strip is severely damaged, with the paper peeling and tearing away to reveal a darker, fibrous layer beneath. On the left side, there are faint, handwritten markings in dark ink, which appear to be "12", "100", "100", "12", "12", and "100" arranged vertically. The overall texture is rough and uneven due to the age and damage.
