5) The new experiment of sorgum (African sugarcane) growing has not been so successful this season as last year. The amount of the cane planted was, to be sure, inconsiderable, and the experiment had therefore hardly a fairly trial. The waste which has hitherto been the only produce of the canes—excepting a small quantity of a coarse spirit and some spirits of wine—is not likely to be at all a largely profitable product, and unless sugar can, as he produced the experiment is likely to be abandoned. It is thought, however, that with adequate capital and some greater skill in the manipulation of the juice a very fair sugar might be produced in quantities which would be largely remunerative.
